SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 1.

NEW RAVELATIONS.—In the rear of the Palacio, at Rome, there is a narrow street, called Via del Palatino. There was nothing peculiar about it except that it was on the direct route from the Circus to the Palace. Two buildings bordering the narrow street, after a long duration of ownership, were recently appropriated for purposes of public utility. In the exercises necessary to the work of demolition the accumulations of centuries had to be removed, and in doing so a grand hall and series of chambers which formed part of the Palace of Agrippa, having been discovered. On the side of the street still untouched a crowd of remains of the nineteenth century, with many strangers among them, stand gazing in wonder upon the marble pavements below, on which the ancestors walked two thousand years ago—the very slabs that divide Augustus and his great minister and general have trodden, and lying upon it just as they fell, colossal masses of the white marble columns and great fragments of the splendid fluted columns of the golden yellow marble of Nomicus which adorned the baths." These discoveries are regarded as they were unexpected. The great hall is, however, the striking feature. It exceeds in length the full diameter of the Pantheon, and is equally grand in importance and its elevation, being adorned with splendid fluted Nomicus marble and the remains of ancient furniture and curious architectural detail. Yet all this has slept for centuries in what Byron calls Rome's "marble wilderness."
